Retributivism - Mark D. White - Oxford University Press The reductionist approach to criminal law punishment, sometimes also referred to as the deterrence approach, is a forward-looking style of punishment which seeks to deter criminals from undertaking future criminal activity. Reductionism vs. Retributism - Term Paper Retributivist theory focusses on punishment to only those who 'deserve' it. Unlike deterrence theory, an innocent can never be punished.

Since they are backward-looking, they are not concerned with the possibility of a person committing a crime. For punishment to be meted out, a person must be found guilty. Retributive Theory of Punishment: A Critical Analysis ... Merits of retributivist theory. The theory discourages people from engaging in crimes because they will be held accountable for their actions. Offenders receive back what they do to other people. The punishment that an individual receives is equivalent to the crime committed. Utilitarian and Retributivist theories of punishment
